Professors Jana R. McCreary

Professor Jana R. McCreary’s article, Tell Me No Secrets: Sharing, Discipline, and the Clash of Ecclesiastical Abstention and Psychotherapeutic Confidentiality, was recently cited by the Tennessee Supreme Court in Redwing v. Catholic Bishop for Diocese of Memphis, No. W2009-00986-SC-R11CV, 2012 WL 604481 (Tenn. February 27, 2012). The article and case discuss ecclesiastical abstention, a doctrine addressing when courts may interpret matters of church doctrine. The article was published in the Quinnipiac Law Review in Spring 2011.

Professor David Pimentel

Professor David Pimentel’s article Criminal Child Neglect and the “Free Range Kid”: Is Overprotective Parenting the New Standard of Care?, was posted to bepress.com on February 9. A number of prominent blogs linked to it, including the Reason magazine’s blog, http://reason.com/blog/2012/02/16/free-range-parenting-youre-going-to-go-t, and The Volokh Conspiracy, http://volokh.com/2012/02/18/when-ordinary-parenting-practices-can-land-you-in-court/, and within two weeks, it had been downloaded over 15,000 times. He has already received offers to publish it from the Utah Law Review and the University of Cincinnati Law Review.

Professor Pimentel was interviewed live on the NRA News on February 17, discussing his article on Criminal Child Neglect.

❖ Professor Lucille Ponte

Prof. Ponte’s article, Leveling Up to Immersive Dispute Resolution (IDR) in 3-D Virtual Worlds: Learning and Employing Key IDR Skills to Resolve In-World Developer-Participant Conflicts, has been accepted by University of Arkansas Little Rock (UALR) Law Review. The article will be part of the law review’s Ben J. Altheimer Paper Symposium, eConflicts Resolved: Evaluations of Legal Solutions to Information-Age Conflicts. In her review of dispute resolution clauses in forty-five virtual worlds, she proposes a new conflict resolution approach; the utilization of “immersive dispute resolution (IDR)” for disputes between owners-developers and subscribers-consumers. This IDR alternative will help leverage both the communication and graphical technological advancements in 3-D virtual worlds and the collaborative and strategic thinking skills virtual participants readily acquire in these digital environments. The paper is slated for publication in May 2012.
